

The 90-Day Prosperity Experiment

Day 41: It Is So Close by Kate Nowak

Hello from my heart to yours,

Around the turn of the last century there was a middle-aged woman who died of starvation in a large American city on the eastern seaboard. She had lived penniless on the street for many years, dependent on handouts from strangers. Her nights were spent sleeping on a stack of old newspapers and rags in a back alley. Because of the way in which she lived, her death surprised no one.

Her demise might have gone unnoticed entirely, in fact, had it not been for what was discovered hidden in the lining of the bulky coat she wore year round, refusing to remove on even the warmest days. Found between the layers of cloth, the tattered coat concealed a sizeable fortune, bound and wrapped stacks of one hundred dollar bills sewn with care into the lining.

For all those years this eccentric woman had been literally cloaked in wealth and yet had gone without, depriving herself of even the most basic necessities.

The story of the odd circumstances surrounding the money and the way the woman had lived soon made the newspapers. Within a matter of days it was discovered that she had once been a young socialite, the only daughter of a prominent banking family in a distant city.

According to a spokesperson for the family, she had simply disappeared many years before and extensive efforts to find her had failed. Family members had assumed for years that she was already dead.

No one in her family had been aware of how she had lived the final days of her life nor did they know or understand why she had chosen to leave the comfort and security she had been born to.

The cash found on her person was legitimately hers, the spokesman assured officials and members of the press, the total being the exact amount she had withdrawn from her own account prior to her disappearance. Why she had never used any of it, he could not say.

There is the possibility that having grown up surrounded by wealth, she'd received so many wrong messages about money that her perception became irrevocably skewed. She may have actually believed the cash she carried had more value serving as insulation for her threadbare coat. She certainly wouldn't have been the first to have a misguided perception of what money is.

Or, perhaps she simply believed that in separating herself from her family, she had also separated herself from the source of her wealth and was therefore afraid to spend any of the cash, fearing she would be unable to replace it. Fear of losing what we have and are comfortable with is a primary reason many of us cannot let go.

Actually, there is no way any of us can ever know what possessed her to live the way she did. It is doubtful that even she was privy to the multitude of old beliefs and programs running in her mind, ultimately directing her behavior.

Whatever her reasoning, and no matter how detrimental it may have been to her own well-being or how illogical it may have appeared to the rest of the world, she lived the way she lived because she deeply and truly believed it was the only way she could. And she was certainly not the first person to behave in a bizarre fashion around money because of erroneous thought patterns and beliefs.

Each and every one of us, in fact, is cloaked in wealth, whether we choose to acknowledge it or not. We are as surrounded by money as that poor deluded woman wearing her cash-lined coat was.

We now know this because of Quantum physics. For well more than a century now, scientists have known the entire Universe and everything in it, when stripped to its basic origin, is really billions and trillions of sub-atomic packets of energy all vibrating together. Nothing is really solid. Nothing is as it seems.

Everything we think, speak and feel has its own vibrational frequency attracting similarly vibrating packets of energy and bringing them back into our world.

Whenever we think about money, we send out vibrating energy particles that seek similar particles and these all coalesce into whatever form we associate with money. If we think of money as being in short supply, then that is the experience that is drawn back to us. If we think of ourselves as being abundantly blessed with an ever-flowing source of wealth then, as with the first example, it becomes our reality.

Money isn't made of energy; it is energy, pure radiating energy that responds to our every thought. The only value money has is that which we assign it. It is always here, always present, as is everything else we could ever need or want, simply waiting in the form of energy, ready to respond to our command. It will come or go, depending upon our attention to it.

In essence, money really is, at all times, closer to us than the lining of the clothes we wear. Our job is not to call it to us, but to remember that it is already there.
